WORKING PAPERS

Adaptive Innovation by Recombining Knowledge (Job Market Paper)

Innovation investments are often specific, but the knowledge they create can be redeployed when economic conditions change. Using the 2014 Alice Corp. v. CLS Bank International decision, I show that innovators adapt to weakened patent protection by recombining affected knowledge with less-affected technological domains. This response is stronger when technologies offer greater recombination opportunities and when relevant complements already lie within firms' technological portfolios. Firms with greater recombination capacity sustain more innovation and experience smaller declines in performance.

How Legal Remedies Drive Patent Litigation Explosions: Evidence from the eBay Ruling

This paper studies how changes in legal remedies affect patent litigation using the 2006 eBay ruling. A screening model and difference-in-differences evidence show that limiting the availability of injunctions increased litigation, particularly by patent assertion entities targeting high-sales firms.
